WEEKLY FINANCIAL NEWS

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV			With new construction homes coming in at a median sales price of $400,500 for February, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, the cost to buy new is only a little more than 4% higher than an existing home. "With more inventory available, the ability to buy down mortgage rates and attractive incentives such as free refinancing within three years of purchase, new construction homes are becoming increasingly appealing," says Brandon Lwowski, senior director of research at HouseCanary, an AI-powered residential real estate data and analytics firm based in San Antonio. "As existing home inventory remains tight, it's expected that more future homeowners will gravitate towards the new construction market." Sales of new construction homes are up, but don't let that deter you. An increase in builder confidence means more new homes will be ready to go sooner rather than later, and may be buyers' choice in this market. "Building starts and housing permits play into this heavily," says Amy Lessinger, president at Re/Max in Denver. "Housing starts are up 2.4% and building permits are up by 5.9%. So yes, it's possible, especially when some reports are showing that nearly 32% of homes sold last quarter were new construction. Overall, an increase in new construction and growing builder confidence is indicative of more options for buyers this year." According to Yun, chief economist and senior vice president of research at the NAR, one-third of current listings are new homes right now. Usually, it's closer to 10%. 			With new construction homes coming in at a median sales price of $400,500 for February, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, the cost to buy new is only a little more than 4% higher than an existing home. "With more inventory available, the ability to buy down mortgage rates and attractive incentives such as free refinancing within three years of purchase, new construction homes are becoming increasingly appealing," says Brandon Lwowski, senior director of research at HouseCanary, an AI-powered residential real estate data and analytics firm based in San Antonio. "As existing home inventory remains tight, it's expected that more future homeowners will gravitate towards the new construction market." Sales of new construction homes are up, but don't let that deter you. An increase in builder confidence means more new homes will be ready to go sooner rather than later, and may be buyers' choice in this market. "Building starts and housing permits play into this heavily," says Amy Lessinger, president at Re/Max in Denver. "Housing starts are up 2.4% and building permits are up by 5.9%. So yes, it's possible, especially when some reports are showing that nearly 32% of homes sold last quarter were new construction. Overall, an increase in new construction and growing builder confidence is indicative of more options for buyers this year." According to Yun, chief economist and senior vice president of research at the NAR, one-third of current listings are new homes right now. Usually, it's closer to 10%. With new construction homes coming in at a median sales price of $400,500 for February, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, the cost to buy new is only a little more than 4% higher than an existing home. "With more inventory available, the ability to buy down mortgage rates and attractive incentives such as free refinancing within three years of purchase, new construction homes are becoming increasingly appealing," says Brandon Lwowski, senior director of research at HouseCanary, an AI-powered residential real estate data and analytics firm based in San Antonio. "As existing home inventory remains tight, it's expected that more future homeowners will gravitate towards the new construction market." Sales of new construction homes are up, but don't let that deter you. An increase in builder confidence means more new homes will be ready to go sooner rather than later, and may be buyers' choice in this market. "Building starts and housing permits play into this heavily," says Amy Lessinger, president at Re/Max in Denver. "Housing starts are up 2.4% and building permits are up by 5.9%. So yes, it's possible, especially when some reports are showing that nearly 32% of homes sold last quarter were new construction. Overall, an increase in new construction and growing builder confidence is indicative of more options for buyers this year." According to Yun, chief economist and senior vice president of research at the NAR, one-third of current listings are new homes right now. Usually, it's closer to 10%.
