WEEKLY FINANCIAL NEWS

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV	RATE 5.99%	APR 6.08%	Home builders have pulled back on construction as buyers sit on the sidelines. Ramping up construction now could cause home prices to fall - welcome news for would be buyers looking for a deal. But, with the supply of new homes for sale still high and buyers still cautious, it might not be the right move for home builders, analysts say. The number of new homes for sale is near levels unseen since the 2008-2009 financial crisis, Wedbush analyst Jay McCanless wrote, citing census data. "Building more homes right now is probably not the correct path," he wrote. There's still a long-term shortage of housing, notes Jim Tobin, the National Association of Home Builders' president and CEO. But right now, there's an oversupply due in part to high financing costs and consumer uncertainty. "I expect that builders will slow down production in the second half of this year to allow the inventory that's on there to sell," he says. "Once we get to equilibrium, I think you'll see the builders re-enter the market." It's weak demand caused by uncertainty, not supply, that's holding back sales right now, Evercore's Kim wrote. "The housing market is now at a fragile equilibrium and increasing production will result in falling prices, which is not in anyone's best interests," he wrote. While first-time buyers would benefit, home builders and their investors would lose out if prices fell. Nearly four in 10 builders cut prices in September, while roughly two-thirds offered some sort of sales incentive, to keep homes selling, according to the NAHB. Such deals and discounts weigh on builders' profit margins and their stocks. Source: Barron's on MSN.com Shaina Mishkin

			Home builders have pulled back on construction as buyers sit on the sidelines. Ramping up construction now could cause home prices to fall - welcome news for would be buyers looking for a deal. But, with the supply of new homes for sale still high and buyers still cautious, it might not be the right move for home builders, analysts say. The number of new homes for sale is near levels unseen since the 2008-2009 financial crisis, Wedbush analyst Jay McCanless wrote, citing census data. "Building more homes right now is probably not the correct path," he wrote. There's still a long-term shortage of housing, notes Jim Tobin, the National Association of Home Builders' president and CEO. But right now, there's an oversupply due in part to high financing costs and consumer uncertainty. "I expect that builders will slow down production in the second half of this year to allow the inventory that's on there to sell," he says. "Once we get to equilibrium, I think you'll see the builders re-enter the market." It's weak demand caused by uncertainty, not supply, that's holding back sales right now, Evercore's Kim wrote. "The housing market is now at a fragile equilibrium and increasing production will result in falling prices, which is not in anyone's best interests," he wrote. While first-time buyers would benefit, home builders and their investors would lose out if prices fell. Nearly four in 10 builders cut prices in September, while roughly two-thirds offered some sort of sales incentive, to keep homes selling, according to the NAHB. Such deals and discounts weigh on builders' profit margins and their stocks. Source: Barron's on MSN.com Shaina Mishkin

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV	RATE 5.99%	APR 6.08%	Home builders have pulled back on construction as buyers sit on the sidelines. Ramping up construction now could cause home prices to fall - welcome news for would be buyers looking for a deal. But, with the supply of new homes for sale still high and buyers still cautious, it might not be the right move for home builders, analysts say. The number of new homes for sale is near levels unseen since the 2008-2009 financial crisis, Wedbush analyst Jay McCanless wrote, citing census data. "Building more homes right now is probably not the correct path," he wrote. There's still a long-term shortage of housing, notes Jim Tobin, the National Association of Home Builders' president and CEO. But right now, there's an oversupply due in part to high financing costs and consumer uncertainty. "I expect that builders will slow down production in the second half of this year to allow the inventory that's on there to sell," he says. "Once we get to equilibrium, I think you'll see the builders re-enter the market." It's weak demand caused by uncertainty, not supply, that's holding back sales right now, Evercore's Kim wrote. "The housing market is now at a fragile equilibrium and increasing production will result in falling prices, which is not in anyone's best interests," he wrote. While first-time buyers would benefit, home builders and their investors would lose out if prices fell. Nearly four in 10 builders cut prices in September, while roughly two-thirds offered some sort of sales incentive, to keep homes selling, according to the NAHB. Such deals and discounts weigh on builders' profit margins and their stocks. Source: Barron's on MSN.com Shaina Mishkin
