NATIONAL BUILDER DIVISION

WEEKLY FINANCIAL NEWS

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV			Housing starts are expected to rise slightly in December, climbing 0.4% to a 1.553-million unit pace. While December is usually a slow month for housing starts, the weather this past December was milder than usual, which apparently allowed construction to proceed at a stronger pace than usual. Employment rose solidly in residential building and at residential specialty trade contractors last month, which would be consistent with at least a modest gain in housing starts. There are some wild cards in the forecast, however. Soaring lumber prices, and shortages of many other key inputs, might cause some builders to hold off on starting new projects. If we were to see an upside surprise it would likely come from multifamily starts. Apartment construction also tends to swing wildly from month to month and has a tendency to spike at year end. Sales of existing homes are expected to fall 1.6% in December to a still exceptionally strong 6.58 million unit annual rate. Some leveling off in existing home sales has been widely expected. Mortgage applications for the purchase of a home leveled off some time ago and pending sales, which reflect purchase contracts for existing homes have fallen in recent months. Supply rather than demand appears to be the problem. Source: Wells Fargo Bank. Weekly Economic & Financial Commentary

			Housing starts are expected to rise slightly in December, climbing 0.4% to a 1.553-million unit pace. While December is usually a slow month for housing starts, the weather this past December was milder than usual, which apparently allowed construction to proceed at a stronger pace than usual. Employment rose solidly in residential building and at residential specialty trade contractors last month, which would be consistent with at least a modest gain in housing starts. There are some wild cards in the forecast, however. Soaring lumber prices, and shortages of many other key inputs, might cause some builders to hold off on starting new projects. If we were to see an upside surprise it would likely come from multifamily starts. Apartment construction also tends to swing wildly from month to month and has a tendency to spike at year end. Sales of existing homes are expected to fall 1.6% in December to a still exceptionally strong 6.58 million unit annual rate. Some leveling off in existing home sales has been widely expected. Mortgage applications for the purchase of a home leveled off some time ago and pending sales, which reflect purchase contracts for existing homes have fallen in recent months. Supply rather than demand appears to be the problem. Source: Wells Fargo Bank. Weekly Economic & Financial Commentary

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV
RATE
2.66%			Housing starts are expected to rise slightly in December, climbing 0.4% to a 1.553-million unit pace. While December is usually a slow month for housing starts, the weather this past December was milder than usual, which apparently allowed construction to proceed at a stronger pace than usual. Employment rose solidly in residential building and at residential specialty trade contractors last month, which would be consistent with at least a modest gain in housing starts. There are some wild cards in the forecast, however. Soaring lumber prices, and shortages of many other key inputs, might cause some builders to hold off on starting new projects. If we were to see an upside surprise it would likely come from multifamily starts. Apartment construction also tends to swing wildly from month to month and has a tendency to spike at year end. Sales of existing homes are expected to fall 1.6% in December to a still exceptionally strong 6.58 million unit annual rate. Some leveling off in existing home sales has been widely expected. Mortgage applications for the purchase of a home leveled off some time ago and pending sales, which reflect purchase contracts for existing homes have fallen in recent months. Supply rather than demand appears to be the problem. Source: Wells Fargo Bank. Weekly Economic & Financial Commentary
