CONV

10 Yr Yield
3.52%	3.64%		This past week's housing data were underwhelming. Sales of new and existing homes fell modestly in September and mortgage applications also declined. The pace of home buying has picked up in recent months, so the modest decline left sales at a fairly high level. Prices of existing homes firmed this past month, reflecting the continued dearth of lower priced homes on the market. Lower interest rates also provided a boost to sales of higher priced homes, which should lift brokers' commissions. Residential investment is set to make a positive contribution to GDP growth in Q3, marking its first contribution to growth in nearly two years. Several larger homebuilders have reported strong demand for new homes, reflecting renewed efforts to deliver more affordable homes to a rising tide of first-time Millennial buyers. There is a bit of a split in home prices, with tight inventories of existing homes leading to a bit of a reacceleration in existing home prices, at least as measured by the National Association of Realtors. Prices for new homes, however, have continued to moderate, reflecting a shift to more affordable starter homes, particularly in the South and Midwest, where land and development costs tend to be lower. Unfortunately, residential investment is too small to make a meaningful contribution to top-line real GDP growth. That may change, as mortgage rates are expected to remain below 4% in 2020 and households are in relatively good financial shape. Source: Wells Fargo Bank. Weekly Economic & Financial Commentary

WEEKLY FINANCIAL NEWS

Financing			Market Commentary
RATE
3.52%			This past week's housing data were underwhelming. Sales of new and existing homes fell modestly in September and mortgage applications also declined. The pace of home buying has picked up in recent months, so the modest decline left sales at a fairly high level. Prices of existing homes firmed this past month, reflecting the continued dearth of lower priced homes on the market. Lower interest rates also provided a boost to sales of higher priced homes, which should lift brokers' commissions. Residential investment is set to make a positive contribution to GDP growth in Q3, marking its first contribution to growth in nearly two years. Several larger homebuilders have reported strong demand for new homes, reflecting renewed efforts to deliver more affordable homes to a rising tide of first-time Millennial buyers. There is a bit of a split in home prices, with tight inventories of existing homes leading to a bit of a reacceleration in existing home prices, at least as measured by the National Association of Realtors. Prices for new homes, however, have continued to moderate, reflecting a shift to more affordable starter homes, particularly in the South and Midwest, where land and development costs tend to be lower. Unfortunately, residential investment is too small to make a meaningful contribution to top-line real GDP growth. That may change, as mortgage rates are expected to remain below 4% in 2020 and households are in relatively good financial shape. Source: Wells Fargo Bank.

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV			This past week's housing data were underwhelming. Sales of new and existing homes fell modestly in September and mortgage applications also declined. The pace of home buying has picked up in recent months, so the modest decline left sales at a fairly high level. Prices of existing homes firmed this past month, reflecting the continued dearth of lower priced homes on the market. Lower interest rates also provided a boost to sales of higher priced homes, which should lift brokers' commissions. Residential investment is set to make a positive contribution to GDP growth in Q3, marking its first contribution to growth in nearly two years. Several larger homebuilders have reported strong demand for new homes, reflecting renewed efforts to deliver more affordable homes to a rising tide of first-time Millennial buyers. There is a bit of a split in home prices, with tight inventories of existing homes leading to a bit of a reacceleration in existing home prices, at least as measured by the National Association of Realtors. Prices for new homes, however, have continued to moderate, reflecting a shift to more affordable starter homes, particularly in the South and Midwest, where land and development costs tend to be lower. Unfortunately, residential investment is too small to make a meaningful contribution to top-line real GDP growth. That may change, as mortgage rates are expected to remain below 4% in 2020 and households are in relatively good financial shape. Source: Wells Fargo Bank.
