WEEKLY FINANCIAL NEWS

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV			In summer 2021 expect to see some changes, but continued low inventory and renter affordability issues are likely to persist through the warmer months. Even with consistent growth in builder activity, most housing markets can still expect the number of homebuyers to outpace the inventory of available homes. The U.S. entered 2021 with pandemic fatigue, though it hadn't - and still hasn't - slowed down homebuyer activity. The first months of the year have seen rapid growth in home prices as low inventory of houses on the market combined with high buyer demand creates fierce competition in suburban areas and medium-to-small metro areas across the country. Some housing market trends caused by the pandemic are expected to continue. In summer 2021, here are a few trends shaping up for the housing market: Interest rates may rise slightly, but are expected to remain relatively low. Home inventory will increase, but it will stay a seller's market. Homebuyers will still be focused in the suburbs, but interest in city living will see some revival. Low interest rates, continued creation of new households across the U.S. and a desire for more space among existing homeowners have driven demand through the roof in 2020 and the start of 2021.

WEEKLY FINANCIAL NEWS

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV			In summer 2021 expect to see some changes, but continued low inventory and renter affordability issues are likely to persist through the warmer months. Even with consistent growth in builder activity, most housing markets can still expect the number of homebuyers to outpace the inventory of available homes. The U.S. entered 2021 with pandemic fatigue, though it hadn't - and still hasn't - slowed down homebuyer activity. The first months of the year have seen rapid growth in home prices as low inventory of houses on the market combined with high buyer demand creates fierce competition in suburban areas and medium-to-small metro areas across the country. Some housing market trends caused by the pandemic are expected to continue. In summer 2021, here are a few trends shaping up for the housing market: Interest rates may rise slightly, but are expected to remain relatively low. Home inventory will increase, but it will stay a seller's market. Homebuyers will still be focused in the suburbs, but interest in city living will see some revival. Low interest rates, continued creation of new households across the U.S. and a desire for more space among existing homeowners have driven demand through the roof in 2020 and the start of 2021. ### WEEKLY FINANCIAL NEWS

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV	RATE 2.93%	APR 3.11%
FHA	2.25%	2.91%
10 Yr Yield	1.68%		In summer 2021 expect to see some changes, but continued low inventory and renter affordability issues are likely to persist through the warmer months. Even with consistent growth in builder activity, most housing markets can still expect the number of homebuyers to outpace the inventory of available homes. The U.S. entered 2021 with pandemic fatigue, though it hadn't - and still hasn't - slowed down homebuyer activity. The first months of the year have seen rapid growth in home prices as low inventory of houses on the market combined with high buyer demand creates fierce competition in suburban areas and medium-to-small metro areas across the country. Some housing market trends caused by the pandemic are expected to continue. In summer 2021, here are a few trends shaping up for the housing market: Interest rates may rise slightly, but are expected to remain relatively low. Home inventory will increase, but it will stay a seller's market. Homebuyers will still be focused in the suburbs, but interest in city living will see some revival. Low interest rates, continued creation of new households across the U.S. and a desire for more space among existing homeowners have driven demand through the roof in 2020 and the start of 2021.
