			Housing demand has roared back from its coronavirus-related slump, with the mortgage purchase applications index now up 21% year-over-year. Coronavirus job losses have disproportionately affected renters, leaving many prospective homebuyers relatively unscathed for now. And with mortgage rates at record lows, many are finally taking the plunge into homeownership. Existing home sales were much weaker in April than new home sales, likely due to differences in the prevalence of virtual tours. Overall, it appears realtors and homebuyers have been surprisingly nimble, adapting to an environment with less open houses and more virtual tours. It may take some time for the stronger demand to materialize in the sales data, but make no mistake that the demand is there, and rising. And with construction perhaps slower to increase housing starts disappointed last week-we could see greater upward pressure on home prices. WEEKLY FINANCIAL NEWS

Financing			Market Commentary
CONV	RATE	APR
	3.05%	3.29%	Housing demand has roared back from its coronavirus-related slump, with the mortgage purchase applications index now up 21% year-over-year. Coronavirus job losses have disproportionately affected renters, leaving many prospective homebuyers relatively unscathed for now. And with mortgage rates at record lows, many are finally taking the plunge into homeownership. Existing home sales were much weaker in April than new home sales, likely due to differences in the prevalence of virtual tours. Overall, it appears realtors and homebuyers have been surprisingly nimble, adapting to an environment with less open houses and more virtual tours. It may take some time for the stronger demand to materialize in the sales data, but make no mistake that the demand is there, and rising. And with construction perhaps slower to increase-housing starts disappointed last week-we could see greater upward pressure on home prices. 			Housing demand has roared back from its coronavirus-related slump, with the mortgage purchase applications index now up 21% year-over-year. Coronavirus job losses have disproportionately affected renters, leaving many prospective homebuyers relatively unscathed for now. And with mortgage rates at record lows, many are finally taking the plunge into homeownership. Existing home sales were much weaker in April than new home sales, likely due to differences in the prevalence of virtual tours. Overall, it appears realtors and homebuyers have been surprisingly nimble, adapting to an environment with less open houses and more virtual tours. It may take some time for the stronger demand to materialize in the sales data, but make no mistake that the demand is there, and rising. And with construction perhaps slower to increase-housing starts disappointed last week-we could see greater upward pressure on home prices.
